$1 million

If I had 1,000,000 dollars to create change in the world, I honestly believe I wouldn't do anything. I firmly stand by the fact that people cannot change, and that history will always repeat itself. I say this because of my personal beliefs and my observations of the world. For example, in this day and age, acting like a criminal, or being talentless is recognised more than being a hard worker or being a naturally gifted individual who stands out among the crowds of people. This is the society that we live in today, and I don't see a way that this is going to change with 1 million dollars. This way of society is profitable, people easily take advantage of this and earn money, or get recognised on such a massive scale, that money flows there way, and they have not put in the same amount of work that many others have. Also I am the first one to say that this country is great, I love America, but this country is divided, there are always teams of Americans going against each other, in politics, socially, etc. Even being a different race or from somewhere else creates a division, maybe this isn't as noticeable as it was in the past, but it is still an issue that is not fixed. I simply don't believe that 1 million dollars can fix this divide. Lastly, my final point is, if true change is to come about, than money shouldn't be the anchor of the solution. I believe that if you want to make change, you do not go outside and protest and be civilly disobedient, I think that those tactics are outdated and that there is a better way to start change. I believe that as an individual, you have to be a leader, start discussions, not protest and belittle all opposing sides to you, but acknowledge them and show them why you support what you believe in, and why they should too. This is how true change should happen, so all in all, if I had 1,000,000 dollars to create change in the world, I wouldn't use it.
